Ask a Roanoke neighbor who handles their bugs and there is a fair chance the answer is Perdue Exterminators. The company has been working out of the Cave Spring area of southwest Roanoke County since S.G. Perdue started it in 1969, and it is still a family owned pest control company today. That kind of staying power does not happen by accident in a valley where termites, ants, mice and spiders all compete for space inside local homes.

A Local Company With Deep Roots

S.G. Perdue began the business from his house and the trunk of his car. His son Andre joined Browse around this site the work after coming home from the military, and in the early 1980s the family bought property on Old Cave Spring Road and built the office that customers still visit today. Jeff Hudson now leads the company as owner and President, carrying forward the same idea the business has always run on: large enough to serve you, but small enough to know you.

That motto shows up in how the work gets done. Rather than sending a different stranger every visit, Perdue keeps a small, experienced crew of technicians who know the Roanoke Valley, its older housing stock and the way Virginia humidity drives pest activity from spring through fall. When a technician has spent decades crawling under homes in Raleigh Court, Salem and Vinton, they recognize a moisture problem or an ant trail long before a newer company would.

For buyers and sellers, the team also prepares wood destroying insect reports, water testing and septic inspection reports, which keeps real estate deals moving without a second contractor.

Customers also tend to stay. Reviews on the company website describe families who have relied on Perdue every year for all their pest needs, technicians who take extra care spraying around toddlers and pets, and timely service when a problem pops up.
