Why Insurance Adjusters Want a Fast Recorded Statement After a Midland Wreck The call often comes within a day or two. You're sore, your car is sitting at a body shop off Front Street, and a friendly adjuster from the other driver's insurance company wants to "just get your side of the story" on a recorded line. It can feel like a routine step. It isn't. A recorded statement is evidence, and it's usually gathered to help the insurer, not you. Why the rush? Early on, https://hectornsba028.clearhavendigest.com/posts/top-25-motor-vehicle-trial-lawyers-recognition-for-jimmy-doan you may not know how badly you're hurt. Soft tissue injuries, concussions and back problems often feel worse over the following days. If you tell an adjuster you're "fine" or "a little sore" on day two, those words can be played back months later while you're in physical therapy. Adjusters also know that memories are shaky right after a crash. Small differences in how you describe speed, distance or timing on a road like Loop 250 north or Andrews Highway can later be used to question your credibility. The adjuster may sound kind and patient, and many are. But their job is to close the file for as little as possible, and a fast recorded statement is one of the easiest Midland Car Accident Lawyer ways to do that before you've even seen a doctor twice. What should you avoid saying? Don't admit fault or apologize, even out of politeness. Texas uses proportionate responsibility, so any statement suggesting you were partly to blame can reduce your recovery, and if you're found more than 50 percent at fault you can't recover at all. Don't guess about speeds or distances. Don't downplay your injuries or describe your medical condition before a doctor has. It's perfectly okay to tell the caller you'd rather not give a recorded statement right now and that someone will follow up with them.
