Compare a landscape drawing with the written brief by checking the intended use and the boundaries of the https://mylesjgbx702.image-perth.org/choosing-a-landscaping-service-compare-the-work-before-the-quote proposed work. A drawing and a proposal can explain different parts of the same discussion.

Match the main uses

Locate the entrances, routes and activity areas mentioned in the brief. Ask how the proposed arrangement responds to them. If an important use is unclear, record the question rather than assuming it has been handled elsewhere.

Identify undecided details

Ask which elements are selected and which are illustrative or still under discussion. Keep material and planting questions visible. An example on a preliminary drawing should not silently become an agreed specification.

Keep versions aligned

Save the drawing with the proposal and brief version it belongs to. When the layout changes, check which written descriptions need updating. Use the current set during later conversations so that an earlier image does not contradict a revised scope.

Keep the next decision clear

A brief remains useful when priorities change if the revision is recorded clearly. Explain the new priority, identify any affected selections and compare the updated proposal with that revised purpose.
