Deciding between fixing a damaged phone and buying a new one is rarely about the screen alone. It is really a question about the age of the phone, how well it still does its job and how you feel about it, and a quick checklist can save you from a rushed choice. This guide walks through the questions we would ask at Free Fusion in Corby if you brought a cracked handset to the counter, and shows when phone screen repair is the better route.

Start with age and software support. If your phone is only a few years old and still receives updates from its maker, a new screen can give it plenty more life. If it is so old that apps are dropping support and updates have stopped, a repair may be harder to justify. Next, think about performance. A phone that opens apps quickly and holds charge through the day is a good candidate for repair. One that crawls, overheats or dies at fifty per cent is telling you something different, and phone screen repair the battery may need attention as well as the glass.

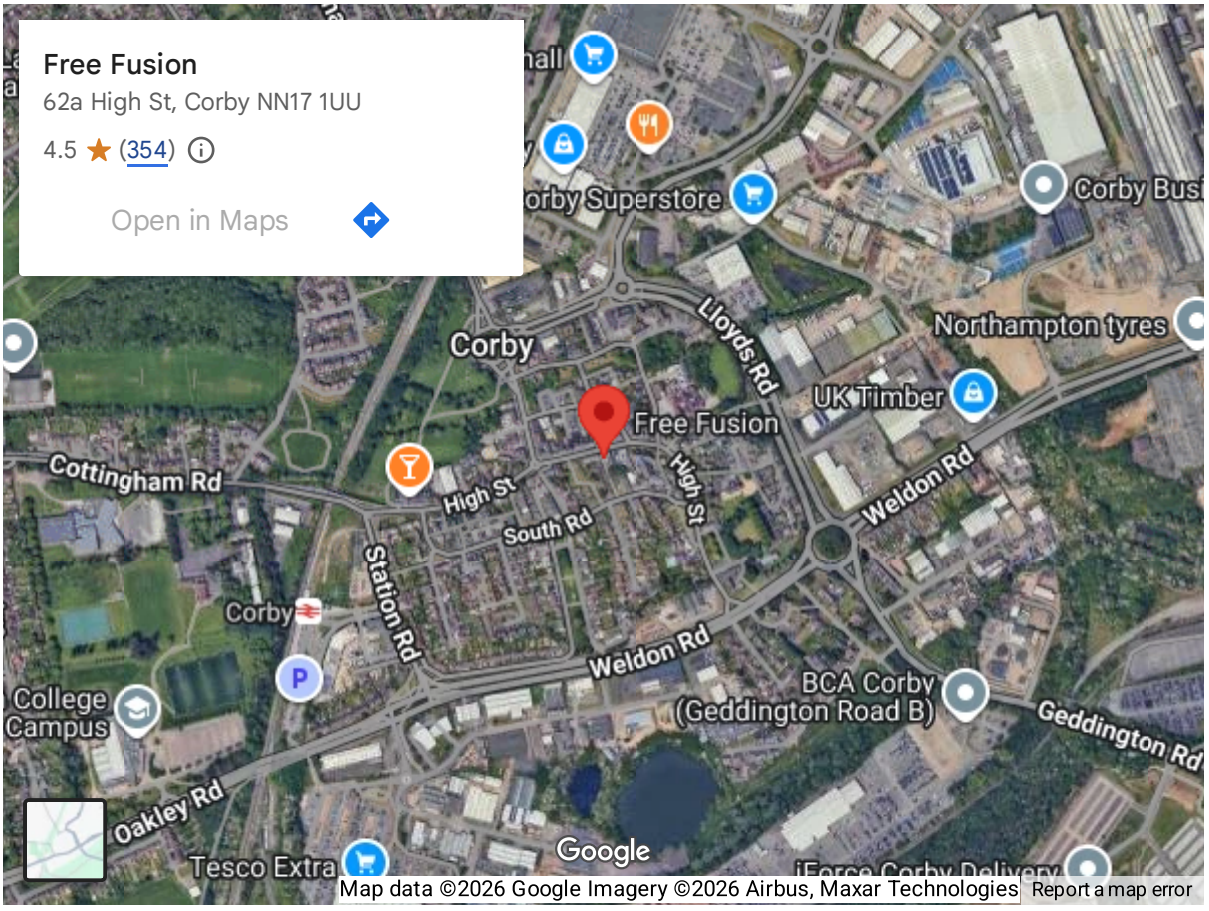

Then look at the money. A screen repair, with iPhone screens starting from £24.99, will usually cost much less than a modern handset, but the comparison only works if the rest of the phone is healthy. This is where a diagnostic check helps. Free diagnosis is available for local customers, so we can test the battery, charging port, cameras and speakers while the phone is on the bench, and you will know whether one repair is enough or whether several are looming.

Consider the hassle factor, too. Switching phones means transferring data, re-entering passwords, setting up authenticator apps and hoping nothing gets left behind. Repairing means handing the phone over and collecting it later, often the same day. Most smartphone screen replacements are completed within about an hour at our Corby centre, which makes repair the quicker route in most cases. Our repairs are also backed by a warranty, so you have support after the work is done.

There are good reasons to upgrade as well, and we are happy to say so. If you were already wanting a better camera, more storage or a newer design, a broken screen can simply be the nudge you needed. If you do replace the phone, we can still help with the old one, whether you want to pass it to a family member or keep it as a spare.
