

Order sunflowers one to two weeks before a distant graduation party, and allow more time if the celebration falls during a busy graduation period. Aim for delivery the day before the party, provided someone can receive the flowers and keep them in water.

Choose the arrival day first

Working backward from the party makes the timing easier. A delivery the day before leaves room to arrange the stems, check their condition, and deal with a problem if one arises. It also means the flowers need a safe place to stay overnight.

If the host has no room for them, ask about delivery on the morning of the party instead. Confirm that someone will be there to accept the flowers before guests arrive. A surprise is lovely, but a box left outside in heat can quickly lose its appeal.

Allow room for a busy season

Graduations often bring many celebrations close together. Ordering one to two weeks ahead gives you a better chance of finding the delivery date and arrangement you want. For a large order, an unusual color, or a party on a popular weekend, start asking earlier.

Sunflower availability can vary by location and season. Before settling on a design, check what is available near the party venue and ask what substitutions might be used if sunflowers are limited.

Make a simple delivery plan

You may be far away, but a few details can help the flowers arrive where they are needed.

1. Confirm the party address, delivery date, and a contact number for someone at the venue.
2. Ask the host or another helper who can accept the flowers and put them in water.
3. Choose an arrangement suited to the space, such as a low vase for a food table or taller stems for an entryway.
4. Check the order details and delivery instructions before placing the order.

If the party is at a rented venue, ask the host to confirm that deliveries can be accepted there. A home address may be more practical if the flowers can be carried to the celebration.

Help the flowers last through the party

Fresh water and a cool spot matter once the sunflowers arrive. Ask the person receiving loose stems to trim them and place them in a clean vase of water. Keep the arrangement away from direct sun and heat while it waits for the party.

For a vase arrangement, make sure there is enough water and follow any care instructions included. A little preparation lets the host enjoy the flowers rather than search for a vase as guests are gathering.

Questions about timing and delivery

Can I order sunflowers more than two weeks ahead?

Yes. Ordering earlier can be useful for a large celebration or a date with heavy demand. Confirm the requested delivery date before you place the order.

Should the flowers arrive on graduation day?

They can, but check the schedule first. The host may be at the ceremony or traveling between events and unable to receive them.

Can sunflowers stay overnight at the venue?

Ask the venue. They need water and a cool place, and the staff may not be able to store or care for them.

What if I do not know the party address?

Ask someone close to the graduate for the delivery details. Confirm the address and a contact number before ordering.
